I'm facilitating a and my coachee isn't feeling well. What do I do?

Golden Triangles are usually about personal development. We're all people, however, which means we encounter challenges occasionally, that get in the way of (and are more important than) our personal development. Are you worried that your coachee may be going through or headed towards such a situation? Do they seem (increasingly) tired, stressed, short-tempered, physically and/or emotionally absent? After bringing it up during a Golden Triangle meeting, here's what you can do as a facilitator.

Guidelines for meetings when your coachee is absent part-time:

Golden Triangles are not mandatory, as long as your coachee is absent part or full-time.

If they do take place, golden triangle meetings are no longer about development, meetings become check-in moments to discuss how someone is doing and how they are experiencing the process or way of working surrounding their situation.

For advice and agreements about someone's schedule (number of hours at work), refer your coachee to HR.

As a facilitator, you can help someone prioritise tasks during working hours, or advise them about how to manage their time and stakeholders well.

Last but not least, even in this situation, you're still someone's coach. Remember not to act as a manager, but instead facilitate your coachee in finding ways to stay healthy and happy at work.

DIGITAL POWER